

Manifestation: Coaching from Possibilities to Action

Do you ask your clients something like this? What action will you take before our next meeting? or How can you maintain momentum towards the outcome you want? or What will you do as a result of our coaching in the next few weeks? I propose you do not ever need to ask this question if you do an effective job of 1) laying the foundation before and allowing the client enough space for this answer to emerge from innate wisdom and 2) helping the client gain fantastic clarity about the future desired result. The role of the coach is far less directive and far more significant in designing actions in the client-coach partnership than I thought for my first 20 years coaching. The power of the coach is to create and hold the space for expanding possibilities and trust the client to know when to choose the action and what action to choose. Masterful coaches do not need to ask clients what actions they will take.

In this article you will explore spiritual, physical and neuroscience perspectives about how to coach clients to move from possibilities to taking action and the roles played by the client and the coach in this process. Exercises will help you validate the material for yourself. The material is organized according to the natural sequence that occurs: 1. Before the action is selected (creating opportunities/possibilities) 2. During the consideration of options (evaluating choices/options) 3. After the action is selected This article is not based on research; it is based on a Master Coach's observations, as well as what I have studied, read and applied from spiritual, neuroscience and brain physiology wisdom throughout 28 years experience in the coaching profession. Read on to understand how I came to this conclusion and as you read, remember that a basic premise of coaching is that clients have their own answers and our role is to allow these answers to emerge.
