This is a well-researched account of a very interesting period for the property industry, written in lively fashion. It reflects the vernacular of the time and for all those who were active during this period it represents an enjoyable record. Sir John Ritblat: Hon. President, The British Land Company PLC Vivian Linacre is one of the very few, still active, survivors of the first generation of agents in the 1950s who pioneered commercial property development, bringing the industry from London to Scotland. This book will help to bridge the huge gap between those early practitioners and the investment analysts and asset managers of today. Andy Irvine: Chairman, Jones Lang LaSalle (Scotland) A well-documented history of the evolution of the commercial property market, with flair. This book is a truly fascinating insight into a world never before narrated in this fashion, containing an enjoyable abundance of historical facts mixed with humorous sound-bites. A genuine must-read. Henri Vuong: Chair, Society of Property Researchers (2012) An informed and first-hand personal chronicle of the UK's commercial property market from the early 1950s through to the mid-1970s. Providing an engaging account and analysis of the drivers and flows of the early development of the UK's commercial property sector and giving voice to the property personalities of the period, this text explains how the commercial property sector grew to become a key component in Britain's post-industrial economy. Ian Selby: Director of Research and Innovation, The College of Estate Management
